

THE OSIREION AT ABYDOS

Roman Engineering

INTRODUCTION

Around 600 BC the Twelve Cities of the Etruscan nation in central Italy annexed a village on their southern borders called Rome. Over the next century they overhauled the city. The Etruscans built temples, roads, aqueducts, and the mighty Forum in the center of Rome. Beneath the Forum they constructed a massive underground storm drain called the Cloaca Maxima. It is still in use to this day, and in fact is the oldest engineered structure in continuous use anywhere in the world. They must have gotten their stone working skills from somewhere, and that is why I have dwelled on the Osireion at Abydos - the oldest known structure along the Nile River in Egypt - as evidence of their previous work. This website details the structure of the Osireion, its wall writings, purpose, and history... placing The Osireion far, far back into the very dawn of history, when Angels reigned supreme.

It's easy to see that The Etruscans weren't just an obscure little nation in central Italy overwhelmed by the Roman Empire - they were already 10,000 years old when Rome happened; in fact, they created Rome, and managed it ~ and survived it, to the modern day. Our history is often associated with that of the not-so-mythical creature called Leviathan.

Just like it says in the Book of Job, our nation was destroyed thousands of years ago when our aqueduct was wrecked and a part of it known as the Osireion at Abydos was used to keep Leviathan, in its natural cool aquatic environment. Then the Hebrews took Leviathan - aka the "golden calf" - with the help of the Egyptian's high priest Moses. Outside of its natural habitat; well, the seven plagues happened. Eventually, the Hebrews figured it all out and thereafter kept Leviathan beneath the Temple in Jerusalem in a tunnel complex which leads to a huge underground cavern supplied by a massive aqueduct.

The Ides of Man

I recommend you read the pages on this site in sequence so you don't take things out of context and misinterpret the presentation. A summary of the investigation follows:

(1) There is a place called the Osireion in Abydos, an ancient burial grounds in Egypt, that when first excavated in the early 1900's was said to be over 10,000 years old by both archaeologists at the digs. I allege it was actually an engineered structure, designed as the source for an aqueduct designed to tap the Nile River aquifer to deliver fresh water to a civilization inland.

(2) From 10,000 to 3,000 BC Egypt was a very wet place, tropical in climate. When the rains diminished and the surface water dried up, this civilization would need to get fresh water. The design of the Osireion would suit this need: it's 50 feet below ground, of extremely massive construction (for water pressure), and has no floor - the central area goes down at least twelve feet deep, and still has no floor. This is exactly how the Romans built their aqueducts 3000 years later, if on a much smaller scale.

(3) The Book of Job says that Job's civilization - which I believe built this Osireion - died out instantly. This implies their water source was cut off, instantly. Job says that this was the result of a pact between "God and Satan," and I believe this means a pact between the original Hebrews - and the even more ancient People of Job.

(4) A map is below showing the location of the Osireion relative to a modern day oasis known as "The Great Oasis" during the Roman era. This would have been the center of the older Sahara civilization when the area was tropical.

(5) The Sphinx is supposed by most archaeologists to be about the same age as the Osireion. It has the same erosion patterns, and other tell tale signs. The sequence of pages here suggests that the Sphinx was built right after the Osireion was destroyed, as told in the Book of Job, and that the Sphinx was constructed by the Etruscans before they were driven from Egypt, to tell posterity about their ancient civilization.

Pre-history

*"Who set its measurements, since you know?
Or who stretched the line on it?
On what were its bases sunk?
Or who laid its cornerstone?"
- Job 38:5,6*

The Floor Plan

The Osireion proper is approached via a long stairway down from the surface fifty feet above. These steps lead to the massive entrance (see images below), into the Central Hall.

The overall dimensions are about the size of an Olympic sized swimming pool. The floor plan (see illustration below) shows a rectangular pool about ten feet wide and two sets of steps leading from a central court from either side down into the water. Seventeen notches around the perimeter are small rooms about eight feet square. Their floors are above the level of the pool, which is a ten foot wide rectangle between the notches and the pillars in the central court. The two indentations in the middle of this court were thought to be where tombs or ritualistic artifacts were kept. The Ark of the Covenant is about the size of the larger indentation. The Osireion was far and above the most sacred Temple in all of Egypt; and it would be the logical place to keep the Ark. I believe the Osireion is the fabled "Well of All Souls," where the Ark was supposedly kept.

The entire structure is built of simple granite stones weighing hundreds of ton each, but showing great elegance in construction. Ten massive pillars surround the middle courtyard. It is believed that equally massive stones were used to cover the Central Hall, as a roof. The steps into the pool from the courtyard were not modified after the fact, as one might think. The report by the archaeologist who made the original excavation in the early 1900's for the Egypt Exploration Society clearly notes they are uneven; so much so that he made explicit reference to this fact. (See "its antiquity" section for a good picture of these steps.) (1)

The walls inside the courtyard were once covered with writings and pictures. There is still much controversy about the origin of these images. They were quite superficial in nature because within a few years of excavating the Osireion in the early 1900's all the images had disappeared, leaving stark stone walls, floor and ceiling. (2) It was common for Pharaohs to redecorate temples of their predecessors and to claim them as their own. Seti I built a large temple complex on the surface, fifty feet above the Osireion; and the wall writings claim the Osireion in his name.

Seti I's temple is aligned to the Osireion, although it is the only temple in Egypt to have a sharp L shape; which was apparently done to accommodate the Osireion. The architecture of the Temple and the Osireion are also quite dissimilar; in fact, the architecture of the Osireion is unique in all of Ancient Egypt. (The orientation of Seti's Temple at surface level and the Osireion fifty feet below is shown in the second figure in "its antiquity" page.)

Steps in Time

Overall, what remains of the Osireion today is hauntingly majestic. It is a simple place, built deep underground above a natural well. It's clear, cool waters fill an elegant pool surrounded by massive columns. Steps lead from the central portico into this pool, surrounding a stone island in the middle of the place. The entire structure is perfect in every way; except for the steps ~ they are ragged, of uneven depth and height. Why would they overwhelm elegance of the Osireion be marred by these ugly, ragged steps? The only likely explanation is that when Seti I discovered the Osireion, these steps did not exist. They were carved into the massive rock foundation, using primitive tools and unskilled labor.

In fact, Frankfort states, "... the Central Hall is not constructed for use, and that therefore no architectural explanation can do justice to its peculiarities: it was exclusively the three dimensional expression of a religious idea, which thus should give us the clue to the building." (3) Among these odd features: no trace of a floor has been found in the rectangular canal around the island; the seventeen cells have no floor; and no traces of any floor slabs, cements or even any place where such a floor might be joined to the shear walls.

Frankfort also notes that there are notches carved in the Central Hall and outer perimeter to hold a .5 meter thick slab as a cover for the rectangular pool; e.g. as a walk across it to the island. There is no trace of these slabs, even fragments; in the pool itself or elsewhere in the Osireion. I believe these slabs were used to carve the Ten Commandments, as were supposedly kept in the Ark of the Covenant. The question is: who carved them?

Abydos

From 13,000 BC to 10,000 BC Egypt was not a desert at all. It was a lush, green tropical paradise dotted with many deep surface lakes. Then around 10,000 BC the rains started to diminish to the point where after 3000 BC there was no rain at all. Egypt quickly became a desert. (1) Perhaps a civilization of sorts grew up during the rainy epoch. The sudden emergence of a strong, structured kingdom of Egypt must have had its origins somewhere. They had a fully developed philosophy already; the Pyramid Texts, which evolved into the famous Book of the Dead. Spell # 662 dates from before 3100 BC, and tells the dead "...to cast the sand from his face." This was a common allusion of that era, as you might expect. Their whole ecosystem having been blanketed with drifting sands, then destroyed altogether by the desert whirlwind, according to the Book of Job.

Ancient Egypt as we now know it appeared circa 3000 BC. The first Pharaoh of any note, Khasekhemwy, created a very odd monument in 2700 BC in an area that would become known as Abydos - the sacred burial grounds of all future Kings and Queens. Pharaoh Khasekhemwy left a fleet of 75 ft. wooden boats in the middle of what is now open desert. They lie almost 10 kilometers west of the Nile near a temple built by Seti I 1400 years later. (3) The presence of these highly engineered boats implies a technologically advanced society predating the emergence of Ancient Egypt. The monument, called the Hall of Barques, itself might be an allusion to their tropical paradise lost to the shifting desert sands, which destroyed their lakes and rendered these boats superfluous.

The Book of Job, you may recall, is the story of a noble man who loses everything to some unseen malice. His estate is ruined. His children are killed in the wreckage of their own homes. The reader is left with the impression Job's entire culture is demolished because all physical evidence of its existence is eradicated. Perhaps this is an allusion to the rapid encroachment of desert sands - the much feared whirlwinds - upon Job's land. I believe the "Land of Uz" that is Job's homeland is a reference to a "Land of Ooze," as in swampy, water rich land - as opposed to dry, caustic desert. The Book of Job would therefore be symbolic of the fate suffered by all Job's people and their land.

I believe Pharaoh Khasekhemwy was the author of the Book of Job. He wrote it to preserve the memory of the lost land; its people, and its philosophy. But who were these people? They were clearly not Hebrews; in fact, the Hebrews seemed to be their sworn enemy. The Book of Job tells how "God and Satan" combined forces against Job and his people - i.e. the Egyptians and some powerful entity; was this the beast Leviathan in the Book of Job?

The Hypogeum

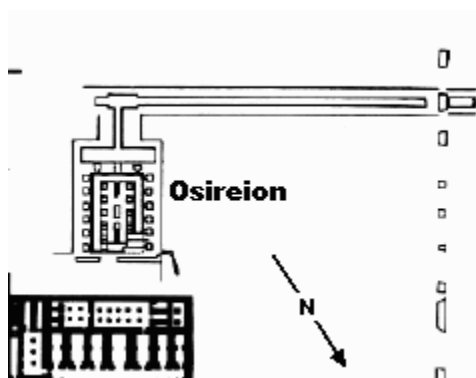

Imagine for a moment that Ancient Egypt was preceded by a coherent civilization, from which it inherited a sophisticated spirituality and an advanced ship building technology. (It's a fact that peoples in the area were quite advanced, with their own language and alphabet.) This civilization would have had a lush landscape and plenty of water during the rainy epoch. A large metropolis could very likely have been built. As the rains diminished and drought set in, however, they would need to resort to other water sources. Assuming the city was distant from the Nile River, and aquifers were inaccessible, then an aqueduct would be needed to carry fresh water to the city from the Nile.

The key to a working aqueduct is accessing a quality water source. (Here's a formal paper I wrote about aqueducts built by the Romans circa 100 AD.) In the case of this inland city state, the best water would not be from the Nile itself because it floods each year and the water becomes heavily silted. An artesian well outside of the Nile's flood plain would be needed to access the aquifer and designed to avoid any silting, using the ground itself to filter the Nile's water.

The Osireion was discovered in the winter of 1901-1902. The archaeologists on the scene, Lady (Mrs.) Petrie and Margaret Murray, had the initial impression that the place was a giant waterworks or "hypogeum." It was a massive stone structure fifty feet below the surface. The famous cartographer Strabo had the same impression in the Roman Era, after which time the place was known as "Strabo's Well." In Strabo's time there was a stone stairway leading from the surface to the Osireion, which tapped an underground aquifer that was always filled with cool fresh water. (4)

The Osireion was not fully unearthed until the 1913-1914 season when Naville lead an expedition of the Egypt Exploration Society. Naville believed it to be the most ancient stone building in Egypt. Subsequent archaeologists - notably Henry Frankfort - contested this, but there is still controversy over the issue. (5)

Seti I built a temple next to the Osireion circa 1300 BC and decorated the interior of the place. Many of the wall decorations seemed almost temporary in nature, according to Henry Frankfort (Mrs. Frankfort was also a member of this expedition) in "The Cenotaph of Seti I at Abydos" (39th Memoir of the Egypt Exploration Society, 1933) p. 36:

"The state of preservation of these inscriptions is exceptionally bad. They are hastily and roughly painted on a thin lime-plaster, which has often cracked or flaked off altogether. ... We felt obliged to copy this wall completely before closing down in 1926 because the exposure after the excavation, with its change in moisture and free access of sun and wind increased the damage ... And we found, in fact, on our return in 1927 that large portions had become unreadable."

The decoration of the Osireion was not even completed by Seti I, but by King Merenptah two generations later. Even then, the above referenced inscriptions in the entrance passage were left in a rudimentary unfinished form.

Water Works

The evidence used by archaeologists to prove Seti I built the Osireion is circumstantial, even careless. The poor quality of the wall decorations is one point against - why go to so much trouble to build such a complex, massive structure 50 feet underground, 10 kilometers from the Nile - then not even bother to lavishly decorate it? That is very much out of character. Seti's cartouches are carved in three places in the Osireion. Yet, it was traditional for Pharaoh's to claim the works of their predecessors by carving their hieroglyphs in their temples. The only other evidence is several granite cramps joining columns to lintels inscribed with Seti I's cartouche. That is not much physical evidence at all, considering the size and complexity of the structure. (6)

There are documents referencing the Osireion during Seti I's reign, notably official orders for quarry stone. However, the volume of quarry stone noted in the official reports, and the existence of only two such references in surviving documentation indicates a much smaller construction; e.g. of an ornate stairway leading down to the Osireion - not the entire Osireion. Archaeologists claim the canal was dug to transport these huge blocks of red granite from the quarries from near Aswan, 200 miles south on the Nile. Had the canal been constructed for the Temple itself, it would have been much closer. The canal doesn't even point toward the Nile (which is East in the diagram; the canal goes West). They claim the canal was dug to avoid the construction of the Temple on the surface. Yet, the pit for the Osireion would be so big that the Osireion would have to be completed, then buried, for the Temple construction to even begin.

In any event, the canal would have to be 10 kilometers long, and well over fifty feet deep because that's where the water table was - i.e. at the level of the Osireion. Creating such a canal in the middle of the desert would be virtually impossible. The canal would have to be hundreds of feet wide so the sloping sand walls would not collapse. What remains of the canal to this day is so immense that not even 2500 years of drifting desert sands have covered it up. It was easily visible to the naked eye to the first archaeologists on the site. The canal would have to be lined with stone or brick from start to finish, to remain in working order in such a desert environment. (The remnants near Seti's temple are so constructed.) A construction project of that magnitude would be survived by many more documents and far more archaeological evidence. Yet, not one such document survives. The only reasonable explanation is that the canal was not built by Seti I at all, but when the Osireion was originally constructed - long before Seti I built his Temple there at Abydos.

However, even if the place was built before Ancient Egypt even existed, the same problems would exist in its construction. For any civilization to go to so much trouble for such a relatively small Temple; it just seems unlikely. It could only be justified as an engineered structure. It's not hard to come up with such a purpose: as a hydraulic device to tap underground water. The design of the Osireion supports this conjecture.

The seventeen cells surrounding the Central Hall are filled with sand. These cells have no bottom (at least Naville excavated them down to 12 feet, and still had not reached a bottom). In fact there are no floors in any of the structure other than the Central Hall. Similar designs were later used by the Romans to tap underground sources for their aqueducts. The sand filled auxiliary chambers serve as sedimentation chambers, filtering any silt that is suspended in the water. These deposits can be cleaned out periodically to enable the system to remain operational for hundreds, if not thousands of years. The huge walls and massive ceiling serve to contain high water pressure, e.g. when the Nile is in flood stage and the water table rises high. The exit chamber is similar to modern hydraulic devices for high pressure systems, acting to isolate any large pressure variations at the source. The entire aqueduct likely acted as a siphon, and the canal was needed to prime the Osireion by way of what later became the stairway entrance. (The exit conduit is clearly visible in the illustration for "the dramatic text" page.)

The Osireion itself is oriented so the exit chamber points inland, perhaps leading in a straight line to the inland city (see the above illustration), via the canal. The canal would bring fresh water without having to go ten more kilometers to the Nile itself. This seems a much more likely explanation for the place. If that's the case, then at some point the aqueduct would have ceased to be operational. Presumably the people would have relocated to the Nile, and might then have made the Osireion into a Temple. It would be the first such Temple at Abydos, which became the sacred burial grounds for the subsequent civilization we know as Ancient Egypt. These people might also have decorated the place; perhaps that's why the writing was so delicate when Frankfort excavated the Osireion: it wasn't 3500 years old, but perhaps twice that.

The mystery is why the people would abandon such an obviously important place. They must have had quite a compelling reason for doing so. It's not known if this might have been the Hebrews, who supposedly did not even exist until around 1500 BC. However, they did have the Book of Job in their collection of tales from their nomadic wanderings, and they tell of a great conflict between themselves and Job's people.

Temple of Osiris

Seti I was the son of a "horse stall" cleaner in ancient Egypt. Yet, he apparently became Pharaoh by virtue of his leadership skill in the military. Seti's son was Ramesses, the Pharaoh from whom the Hebrew slaves escaped in the Exodus. It was Seti I who supposedly discovered the Osireion. At least, he decorated the place and claimed it as his own. However, Neville and Murray, two of the esteemed archaeologists who discovered the Osireion in the early 1900's, stated - in published articles - their belief that Seti I did not build the place, but that it was perhaps 10,000 years old. There are some who still believe this theory.

Actually, I believe the Osireion wasn't discovered by Seti I at all. I believe it was discovered quite by mistake by his predecessor, Akhenaten. I say so because it helps to explain one of the most perplexing mysteries in all of Antiquity: the disappearance of Akhenaten's wife and co-regent, Nefertiti.

Pharaoh Akhenaten was very much a family man. He had many daughters and proudly posed with them in all the reliefs that survive his reign. He alone of all Pharaohs posed with his family so. Nefertiti was more than his wife and the mother of his beloved daughters. She was his co-ruler. She was Queen, in act as well as in name. Then she was abducted. Given his attachment to Nefertiti - and the universal love for her shared by all their subjects - it's not hard to imagine that everybody everywhere in Egypt dropped everything to look for her. They would have literally turned over every stone and burrowed under every sand dune to find her.

The historical record does in fact show that Amarna, the beautiful new city on the Nile built by Akhenaten and Nefertiti (who was widely acclaimed as the most beautiful woman of Antiquity), was destroyed toward the end of Akhenaten's reign. Historians believe Amarna was destroyed because Akhenaten had declared his belief in One God, thus offending all the local gods and goddesses, and their followers. That explanation would be logical, except for the co-regency of Nefertiti - whom many believed to be Isis incarnate. It's much more likely that Akhenaten's One God was worshipped in Amarna faithfully, and tolerated good naturedly elsewhere in the kingdom of Egypt. Given Nefertiti's godlike stature among all Egyptians, her disappearance would spark the greatest manhunt in the history of the world.

I believe Akhenaten tore the kingdom apart looking for her. We know for a fact that Amarna was torn asunder brick for brick; as were the environs, perhaps extending 100 miles south to the ancient burial grounds at Abydos. Nefertiti was never found; but I believe Akhenaten did find the Osireion, buried hundreds of feet deep in the sands of the burial grounds at Abydos. He saw the awesome beauty of it, and recognized its ancient origins. Perhaps he assumed Nefertiti was abducted by the same people who had built the Osireion; who must surely have seemed all powerful - to not only abscond with the most recognizable person in the Ancient world, but to have secretly built this magnificent temple of stone.

Curse of the Pharaohs

When Akhenaten found the Osireion, it was a Revelation. He was Pharaoh, but he - like all his predecessors - had been deceived. The existence of the Osireion was a shock. Moreover, he discovered that it had been used to imprison the strange creature Job calls Leviathan. The priesthood had discovered that this being had a malign influence upon human beings, giving them a temporary mental malaise that the priests promoted as a religious fervor. Leviathan was held captive in the Osireion, and brought to religious festivals in the "dog kennel sized" Ark of the Covenant. All of this had been kept secret by an underground bureaucracy. This secret society was the hereditary Egyptian priesthood that had built up a religious power base in Egypt since the demise of Job's kingdom circa 3000 BC. Leviathan had been their prisoner the whole time. It was these religious zealots who abducted Nefertiti, to keep Akhenaten silent; she was their hostage.

The Pharaoh was enraged, to say the least. Yet, more than the loss of his beloved Queen, he had learned an even darker secret: Leviathan was sentient. It wasn't just a strange creature with strange powers over human beings - it had high intelligence, values, and honor. Over the millennia it had learned the Hebrew slave's language; ultimately, it had communicated to them, inscribing the fabled tablets with the Ten Commandments into the slate slabs from its prison. Likewise, it had carved the steps leading down into the water well from the central island. Naturally, all of this upset the Hebrews greatly, and eventually they stole Leviathan, along with the Ark of the Covenant, and the tablets on which Leviathan had carved the Ten Commandments - hence, all evidence that Leviathan was an intelligent, spiritually advanced entity.

Pharaoh discovered the Hebrew slaves were as anxious as he to free Leviathan and to rid Egypt of its ultra powerful priesthood. It took the a generation to set up the plan - among other things, placing the Hebrew child Moses in the highest order of priests. They captured Leviathan, and made fast their escape from Egypt, under Ramesses who was Seti I's successor. They had to use all their powers to manage the escape, despite all the "plagues," unleashed on Pharaoh and his people by the priesthood. The Hebrews succeeded, though, and they brought the priesthood's most sacred artifacts with them; the Ark of the Covenant, the Ten Commandments, and Leviathan. The Hebrews, upon arrival in their promised land, burned the "golden calf" in effigy, so to speak. Leviathan was free at last.

The Egyptian priesthood was livid with rage. Akhenaten's entire blood line was decimated by the many years of terrible plagues. The whole royal dynasty, their first born children, and those of all their functionaries, were killed. Once their power base in Egypt was secured, they sent army after army to conquer the Israelites and take Leviathan back. Ultimately, ten of the tribes were destroyed and never heard from again.

The Ennead of many Gods

This material is taken verbatim from The Cenotaph of Seti I at Abydos by Henry Frankfort. The material in parenthesis has been added to help those unfamiliar with Ancient Egypt, its symbols, and history.

"The texts start near the entrance with a figure of the king offering a statuette of Maat (goddess who personified the physical and moral law of the Universe) to Horus (the sky god, spirit of light):

"Words said by King Merenptah:
I come to thee, son of Osiris, provided with 'Truth'
every day; I offer her to thee.
There is aversion against untruth in my time,
while I am upon the earth.

(Note: Seti I was succeeded by Ramesses II; who was succeeded by King Merenptah. The reliefs were not completed by Seti I.)

"O Ye Gods who are in the Netherworld, first cavern of the West.
Doorkeepers of the Districts of the Land of the Dead. (1) Ennead (assembly of many Gods) of the Ruler of the West.

Behold. I enter the Darkness.
I open the Gate of Heaven in the West.
Behold. I enter the Land of the West.
Receive me, your arms towards me!
Behold. I know your place in the Netherworld.
Behold I know your names, your caverns, your secrets.
I know from what you live when Duaty (2) gives command to you that you should live.
Your throat breathes when you hear the words of Osiris

"Now after I have entered the Netherworld and taken the roads of the West
you are pacified, your souls are strong, you are powerful in your caves.
You have heard my words. I have called you by your names.
Said Ra to the gods who are in the first cavern of the Netherworld:
O He-nu-tyt serpent (3), who is in its cavern,
one great of fearlessness, first of the Netherworld:
curb your arm, restrain your arm.

"Behold I enter the beautiful West to take care of Osiris,
to greet those who are in him.

I put his enemies in the place of their slaughter.

I command his followers.

I brighten the darkness of the Impassable Place.

O Ne-ha-her serpent (4), who is in its cave, and to whom those who are in the Netherworld hand over the souls of the Place of Destruction,
curb your arm, restrain your arm.

O Yonder Sa-ta serpent (5), bent around Rosetau for the Ruler of the Netherworld,
curb your arm, restrain your arm.

O that Ennead of uraei (6) whose flames are upon their mouths
to burn the enemies of Osiris,
curb your arm, restrain your arm.

O Ennead, which is behind the Bull of the West,
curb your arm, restrain your arm.

O Ye gods who are in secrecy. Chiefs of the Netherworld,
behold I have entered the West. I have passed the first cavern.

I have spoken to those who are in it.

Even what I have said they have done. (7)

It is that which I have commanded on account of which they are pacified.

They have curled their arms and restrained their arms for me.

Behold I have passed by you, (8) you have done
likewise.

O Ennead of gods, at peace upon the secret abodes, lords of great sleeping places, who feel at home in the darkness.

O Ennead of gods, great of silence in the Land of the

West
being Guardians of Souls, Masters of the Needs in the West,
who throw forward their faces like dogs to swallow what is rotten and decayed. (9)
O yonder god great of form,
in whose charge are the secrets of Osiris,
great jaw for the god of the Netherworld
O that goddess of great mystery,
upon whom is the decay of Osiris, to whom is entrusted the nature of the Ruler of the West.
gods curb your arm and restrain your arm for me.(10)

Behold, I enter the West to take care of Osiris,
to greet those who are in him.
I put his enemies in the place of their slaughter.
I command his followers
I brighten the darkness of the Impassable Place;
you are beings at peace in your abodes,
corpses which are powerful, souls which hear my words.
O behold, I pass by you. (11)
He breaths who sees me, who exults about my being.
O Osiris, Chief of the Netherworld, I am Re.
Give me thine arm.(12)

I am Lord of the souls, powerful of the past, whose fear is amongst the Westerners.
I take care of the Netherworld inhabitants.
I cause that the souls rest upon their corpses.
Now after I settled on my corpse, the Netherworld is ...
O Ennead of Osiris, judging in the Netherworld of Osiris, the Chief of the Westerners, whose followers rest in their chapel
Give me your arm.

O Ennead in Osiris,
guide me to the roads of the Netherworld
and of your hidden caves.
I call those who are in the Impassible Place.
I protect them. I take care of them. I brighten them.

I expel their darkness. I cause them to rest in their thrones. (13)

In their thrones, I command thy followers.
I brighten the darkness of the Impassable place.
Thou art a great one, upon his secrets, ...(14)

O great ennead of goddesses ... for the Great One in the rest of the gods who are in their abodes, (15) honorable ones who are followers of the Chiefs of the Westerners.

O Isis, O Nephthys, ye two great goddesses of the West, give ye your arms, join ye your protection.

O ... secret forms of the cavern of Osiris, thine is the shape of the Chief of the Underworld;
thou hast become him;

He has placed thee in his cavern.
Thine is his corpse.

Give me your arm, receive me,
lead me to the roads of the West
so that I may cause to live the corpses which are there, and cause that their souls rest upon them and that they breathe and brighten the darkness. (16)

(1) This line may refer to a grouping of 2nd Dynasty royal enclosures 1 km. west of the Osireion. These include the funerary enclosure of Pharaoh KhaseKhemy and the adjacent Hall of Barques.

(2) Duat is god of the underworld.

(3) He-nu-ty is the Sacred Bark of Henu, god of the dead. May refer to the Hall of Barques in a nearby "cavern" or temple at Abydos, erected by Pharaoh KhaseKhemy.

(4) Nehahra is enemy of the sun god Ra, and is slain daily

(5) Satis is goddess of Elephantine, a sacred island at the First Cataract, considered to be source of the Nile in Egypt

(6) Uraeus is the divine snake of Egypt, a cobra; associated with the goddess of Lower Egypt.

(7) "curb your arm, restrain your arm" are instructions to the reader: start a new paragraph or passage.

(8) "I have passed by you," I've gone way over your head symbolically. It's evidently time to summarize: The dialog to date describes how the Osireion takes waters from origins of the Nile River or "snake" at the First Cataract, via the underworld (water table) to cure the "flames" inflicting the land - scorching heat without rainfall. The Hall of Barks was created by the fearless Pharaoh KhaseKhemy - characteristic of the Prophet Job, going against the status quo - they are ships placed in a sacred "cavern" for posterity, kind of like a modern day time capsule. The water is delivered inland via other underground "snakes" or pipelines.

(9) The climate has changed so much that the aqueduct could not deliver enough fresh water; the purity of water worsened as the volume flow was increased beyond its design. The land dried up. The Osireion had to be disassembled and converted into a Temple to Osiris, dedicated to the god of the underworld and god of blessed waters.

(10) When the land was wasted, the goddess Earth decayed beyond repair. The story of what happened was entrusted to words, and then placed upon the walls of the Osireion.

(11) This place will come to the light of day, some time in the distant future. When it does, may the blessings of Osiris be with you.

(12) Reminiscent of the phrase in Job 40:14, "Then I will also confess to you, that your own right hand can save you." These words were spoken by God to Job; whom we meet again, here at the Osireion.

(13) Again, quoting from Job 38-39, "Do you know the time the mountain goats give birth? Do you observe the calving of the deer? ... Who sent out the wild donkey free?" God speaks, pleading for the safety of His creations, now at the mercy of man.

(14) The power of science is great; the people are unworthy. The secret of the Osireion will remain hidden, until such time as the people are deemed worthy.

(15) The Great Spirit, the Almighty in the Book of Job who freed him from the wrath of the brothers God and Satan.

(16) Pray thee, to help restore the land to its great plenty and fortitude, as once it was.

The Osireion Re Discovered

*"Can you hunt the prey for the lion,
Or satisfy the appetite of the young lions,
When they crouch in their dens.
And lie in wait in their lair?"
- Job 38:38,40*

Testimony of Coins

The previous material on "the texts" places the Osireion in the hands of a select few, charging them with the sacred responsibility of preserving the integrity of the place through Antiquity. But Leviathan was gone, and its secret excised; that is, until Alexander the Great conquered Egypt circa 333 BC and left the descendants of his best general, Ptolemy Soter, upon the throne as the Ptolemy dynasty.

During the Ptolemy's rule, and later during the Roman Empire, the Osireion was not without its visitors. Each such visitor left a coin of the day. The collection was cataloged by the archaeologist Henry Frankfort, and stands as silent testimony to the awe with which the Osireion inspired its visitors. The list follows, keyed to the ruling monarch and the number of coins left:

Ptolemy II - 6
Ptolemy III - 8
Ptolemy IV - XIII - 18
Ptolemy X - 1
Ptolemy XIII - 2
Cleopatra VII - 8
Barbarous copy - 1
Claudius - 6
Domitian - 1
Antonius Pius - 1
Constantius II - 1

(In the Central Hall) "...there were also about thirty fragmentary or decayed pieces of metal which had once been coins: three appeared to have been late Ptolmaic, one probably of Augustus, one of Claudius, and one of Vespasian; only one looked like third century Roman. ... The conclusion to be derived from these coins is that the part of the site where they were found was frequented throughout the Ptolmeic period and the first half of the first century A.D. but was seldom visited afterwards."

Who was it, left these coins in silent tribute through the Ages, at this most awesome of stone artifacts? Was it a secret cult; was it a single family? My guess is that it was the Ptolemies. They were a powerful family in Macedonia when Alexander the Great came to the throne; Ptolemy I was a general under Alexander, and was made Pharaoh of Egypt when Alexander conquered it. As Pharaoh, they knew the secret of Leviathan, and how the Hebrews had taken the Ark of the Covenant; with Leviathan inside. (According to Hebrew tradition, (1) the Ark was the size of a large portable dog kennel. The Ark, coincidentally, was cared for by the Levites, priestly functionaries; or literally meaning "guardians of Leviathan.") Still, the Ptolemies did not know Leviathan's real secret.

NOTE: When the Etruscans left Egypt, after their Civilization was destroyed with the loss of the Osireion and the aqueduct that was their only water supply, they settled in a place that came to be known as Troy. Over the next three millennia Troy was wiped out a dozen times; but each time was rebuilt. Eventually, they pretended to be all gone but had migrated into some remote hills of Greece known as Macedonia. One of their Great Houses were the Ptolemies, who came back to Egypt after Alexander conquered it and remained in power until Cleopatra was dethroned (she then committed suicide by having herself bitten by poisonous asps) by Augustus Caesar not long after her lover Julius Caesar was assassinated on the Ides of March in 44 BC. Cleopatra was the last of the Ptolemies; at least those who were associated with Egypt. (The other twelve Great Houses of Etruscans had settled in central Italy after leaving Troy, a separate city to each as noted on the opening page.)

Not long after the Hebrews left Egypt, Israel had established itself a kingdom by battling all the resident tribes and nation states. It's during this period that they were invincible in battle. Eventually they established a power base and built The Temple in Jerusalem, along similar lines to the Osireion. The first Temple was destroyed in 600 BC; it was replaced by a massive stone Temple. Leviathan was kept in a place beneath the Holy of Holies, i.e. the Tabernacle. This convoluted system of tunnels beneath the Temple, only recently excavated. You can take a guided tour of the excavations. As at the Osireion, the place was supplied with a constant volume of cool water from an underground aquifer.

Leviathan in the Ark

Ptolemy II visited the place one day and noticed the irregularities in the steps carved into the Central Hall. Suddenly Pharaoh realized their significance; and deduced that this was done by Leviathan; it was a sentient creature. Thereafter, Ptolemy - and all his successors - schemed to capture Leviathan from the Hebrews, who had kept Leviathan in the Labyrinth below the Temple in Jerusalem. The Ptolemys, perhaps descendents of the People of Job, were extremely upset that the Hebrews might be abusing Leviathan's powers. Until Leviathan was returned, each attempt to free Leviathan was recorded by placing a coin of the Central Hall of the Osireion.

Inscriptions in the Osireion note that Leviathan has a strange affect upon people. The Hebrews were accused of using this to give them an advantage in battles. It's said that while the Hebrews had the Ark, they never lost a battle. According to legend, the Ark disoriented the enemy enough mentally that they were easily defeated. The impression was as if in a religious ecstasy. The ancient Egyptians had used this property to enhance the religious experience of the faithful who came to the Temples.

NOTE: The ultimate fate of Leviathan is not revealed on this website, but only in my novel Roswell. I can give you a hint, though; it has something to do with Julius Caesar's brief invasion of Britain, and the creature we now call the Loch Ness monster, Nellie. Before Britain, Caesar made a brief foray into Germany, building the famous "Bridge over the Rubicon," but apparently this climate was not to Leviathan's liking. So they took her to a remote Loch in Ireland and set her free. She's been happy ever since - and growing! I suspect her natural (and, future) habitat is hyperspace, where she is a dragon just like the myths say. . . .

Strabo's Well

*"Who has put wisdom in the innermost being,
Or has given understanding to the mind?
Who can count the clouds by wisdom,
Or tip the water jars of the heavens?"
- Job 38:36,37*

Cenotaph (1)

O thou whose head is hidden, give me thy arm:
I place the enemies in the Place of Slaughter,
in the Place of Destruction.
Thy secret is thine ...
Lead me to the roads of the West. (2)

I light the dark Netherworld,
I command my followers when I pass by their cave; (3)
They praise me and jubilate on account of me,
Their souls rest upon their corpses.

I pass through those who are in Tatunen, (4)
I pass through the Impassable Netherworld, to see my corpse which is in the earth,
to light my shapes and my forms.

You enemies of Osiris, (speak thus to me)
your corpses are cut up, your heads are destroyed. (5)
your souls are caught, your blood is shed;
your shadows are subdued, your shapes are not;
you are destroyed in the Place of Destruction.

You (who) are the enemies of Osiris, whose words
the Great Council which is in the Secret Place has judged in the presence of Osiris.
He gives to them evil places
in the Place of Destruction. (6)
This great god cast evil against the enemies of Osiris.
The approaching of this great god
to his cave which is in the Netherworld.
When he enters his field the forms which are in the Netherworld come forth and give their hands.

Anubis who is hidden of nature,
who puts the gods in their abodes. (7)
Re says to this cavern: (8)
O Ye two great goddesses, very great ones, guarding the secret abodes, while Anubis is guarding it (namely) that which contains the corpses, (and the) secrets of this lord of shapes.
Behold I pass this cave in the earth
I light you. I expel your darkness. (9)

(This text refers to a scene which "shows Anubis in front of two vertical ellipses with a female figure and drops of blood (?) in each of them,
and between them a sun disk..")

His shape is his secret,
when he has come into existence
in his first beginning of being created.
This great one, he speaks to them;
they speak to him; he lights them with his light in his cavern ... he sees
Then the darkness hides them
when he has passed. (10)

notes

- (1) A cenotaph is a false tomb - i.e. it has all the trappings of a tomb, but the body is not buried there. This was a common practice in Ancient Egypt. These texts are excerpted in order from the report by Frankfort.
- (2) The account describes events as told by Leviathan .
- (3) The seventeen small cells around the perimeter of the Central Hall are for human observers, whom come periodically to study the creature.
- (4) The creation god, who had human form.

(5) Traditionally, Osiris was cut into many small pieces by his enemy Seth, and the pieces were entombed in the Osireion. The alien was evidently tortured, and subjected to vivisection.

(6) The Place of Destruction is the Osireion; Osiris is the name of the extraterrestrial entity; the Great Council are humans who know this secret and whom abuse the alien's great mental prowess.

(7) Anubis is god of the dead, guiding the visitors through the Underworld into the kingdom of Osiris. He is the only one who knows how to access the Osireion, leading the members of the Great Council there into the presence of Osiris.

(8) Re is the conscience of Anubis, which is why he is recording these things.

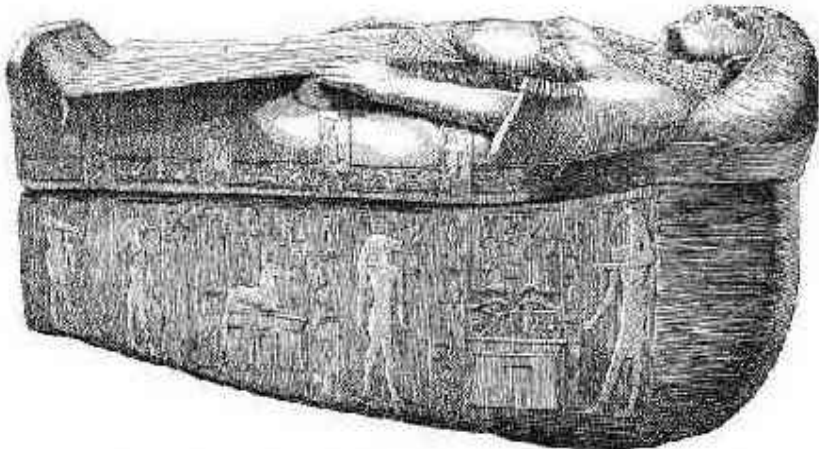

(9) Anubis is saying this to enlighten the reader with the truth.

(10) A darkness due to the aliens' "field" affects the mind of certain highly sensitive individuals who come near to Osiris.

the Zionists

Back in the late 1940's during last half of World War II, Roswell was less than 100 miles from two of the highest security military installations in the world: Alamogordo (where the atom bombs were built and tested) and White Sands Proving Ground (where the Germans V2 rockets were tested). Hundreds of German expatriate scientists were brought there for these two projects. A huge security apparatus was set up as well, to watch the scientists to be sure none of them were Nazis, and to keep these secret projects from being discovered by the Axis. The security net had to cover the area of a whole state because after the A bomb tests there were hundreds of cases of radiation sickness, and these had to be kept from reaching the media because they would indicate to the enemy what was going on there. It was known the Nazis (and the Japanese too ~ they were actually more keen on developing the Bomb than the Germans; all the Japanese research was given to Korea at the end of the war) were conducting their own experiments on developing an A bomb, so any unexplained cases of radiation poisoning would immediately tip them off as the the location of the Allied project.

After the end of the war, nothing changed. The Russians were the new enemy. Even more Nazi scientists were now welcomed with open arms from Pennemunde, the huge research complex where the V2 rockets were developed by the Nazis. If anything the security at the area was tightened because research was being done on another high tech invention of the Nazis: the jet engined aircraft. The Nazis, toward the end of the war, had actually built a small fleet of these aircraft but they could not operate them because they were unable to manufacture the special jet fuel they required. The Nazi economy was run on oil and gas extracted from coal (rubber too), and real oil was needed to manufacture jet fuel.

An aircraft of some sort did crash in Roswell in 1947. There was a huge debris field, 3/4's of a mile long and several hundred yards wide. Tiny bits of metal were scattered throughout. The military claimed it was a weather balloon. Yet, weather balloons don't travel fast enough to have that sort of debris field; it would be a fraction that size. I always thought it was an experimental jet aircraft that had crashed. Why, then did the Army publish a story that it was a UFO? There was nothing to hide from the enemy. The Soviets, with whom we were racing to create the best jet aircraft, knew our research was being done at White Sands because they had participated in the A bomb project. Once the A bombs were used, the public knew about White Sands as well. The Army either fouled up very badly, or they published the UFO story on purpose.

The most important evidence against the crashed jet aircraft scenario is that the crash happened on July 3rd or 4th. The military wouldn't have enough personnel in the area to conduct operations on that date - they would all have gone home to celebrate. The War was still fresh in everybody's mind, and celebrations would still be fervent. The last thing the authorities would do is to schedule a test of their new aircraft on July 4th, to then have to deny all requests for leave. That would raise too many questions from the public: what's the military doing that's so important our soldiers can't come home to celebrate with their families? Everybody would realize the huge military presence in the area, and really start asking questions.

The Secretary of the Defense at the time was James Forrestal. Whether it was a UFO that crashed or not, he would have been there in Roswell in 1947. A committee would have been set up to be sure embarrassing security breaches like this did not happen again. The UFO community alleges the purpose of this high level committee was to protect the nature of the crash, i.e. that it was an alien spacecraft, and that there were survivors. There is really no way to say which was the more likely scenario, although the subsequent behavior of Secretary Forrestal may provide some clues.

The following year, in November 1948, is when Truman won the infamous election over Dewey (many newspapers were printed declaring Dewey the victor). Forrestal, convinced the wall street wonder Dewey would win, had supposedly planned to move right over to the new administration. He was said to have been plotting with Dewey and Dewey's chief advisor, Allen Dulles. (George Walker Bush, President George Bush's grandfather ~ more on this here ~ and the Dulles brothers were the chief fundraisers for the Nazis in America before the war - we can add Dewey to the list now.) His only real connection to the Dulles brothers was that, as Secretary of Defense, he had helped them set up a spy organization completely separate from the CIA called the Office of Policy Coordination (OPC).

President Truman was told about Forrestal's duplicity, in shifting allegiance to Dewey, and fired him. Forrestal appealed to President Truman and asked for a formal investigation of the charges against him. Truman must have believed Forrestal because he ordered the investigation. But it was too late. Forrestal had become paranoid. He believed the American Jews had framed him; he thought the Zionists had him under surveillance. The doctors said he had experienced a total psychotic breakdown with suicidal features. (1) An official determination was never made if Forrestal had actually conspired with Dulles. He was eventually admitted to Bethesda Naval Hospital, and supposedly committed suicide on May 22, 1949.

There can be no doubt that Forrestal was involved in the Roswell cover up, and helped to set up the OPC - perhaps to manage the Roswell situation. The CIA was itself quite new, and it's reasonable to surmise that the OPC was set up in response to some completely new threat. What Forrestal did not realize was that this alien threat had earthly allies. He wasn't aware that the Dulles brothers had secretly funded the Nazis before the war. Everything was going perfectly for them, until Dewey lost the election. The American Jews suspected Forrestal, so they really did frame him. Then they noticed Forrestal's peculiar mental state, and suspected it was caused by exposure to an alien. They concluded that Roswell really was the crash of an alien spacecraft, and that there were survivors. The Zionists put him under surveillance 24 hours a day, just as Forrestal had suspected. They had to find out where the alien was being held captive.

None of this wouldn't have happened if the Zionists weren't already alerted to the mysterious crash at Roswell in the first place. They would have seen Forrestal's illness as just a reaction to stress, and never given it a second thought. So, it's necessary to conclude that the initial announcement to the media after the Roswell crash on July 4, 1947 was not a snafu, but a purposeful announcement with the express intention of alerting the Zionists.

All of which brings up another possibility, that the entire situation was set up in order to shoot down a UFO and capture an alien. The only reason the A bomb was being researched at Alamogordo in the first place is because Albert Einstein wrote a letter to President Roosevelt saying the Nazis had a similar program under way. Einstein lied. Hitler never expressed an interest in the atom bomb, and Himmler regularly arrested the scientists involved in the project or transferred them to other projects (2). It would be natural for aliens to notice the explosion of A bombs, then come to investigate where they were being tested. The German's V2 bombs were totally useless during the war as a weapon; but they were captured and tested at White Sands Proving Ground (now known as White Sands Missile Range). There was a huge contingent of German expatriots who were conveniently assembled at White Sands during the war to research these technologies. Thus, the authorities had the bait for the trap, the means to shoot down the fast alien spacecraft, and the technological expertise to not only make the trap work but to study the alien technology (and physiology) ~ does "alien" mean extraterrestrial, or just unknown?

All of which implies a very considerable "Zionist" contingent in America during the war. It was difficult for Forrestal et al to see who this faction was. They seemed to be Jews from Israel, but they were not like any Jews they had ever known before.

Fifty years later, the distinction is not so hard to make. It was the scientific community, as you shall see . . . although those nazi's wanted everybody to think it was the Jews, so that the whole world would help.

Isis' Agony

Roswell, 1984

It all began back in the early 1980's when I was stationed at the U.S. Army White Sands Missile Range; less than an hours drive from Roswell, New Mexico - where the alleged UFO incident happened circa 1947. I'd always assumed that the huge debris field there had been caused by a crashed jet aircraft being developed at what was then White Sands Proving Ground. The Germans had built experimental jets toward the end of World War II but couldn't fly them for lack of enough special jet fuel. After the war the U.S. wanted a heads up on the Russians, and picked up where the Germans left off. As events unfolded at White Sands, I started having second thoughts - about that Roswell crash being a jet aircraft.

A simple disciplinary action that turned into a MAJOR fiasco is what tipped me off. I ratted on a couple of senior enlisted for using drugs while on duty at the weather station - heck, the NASA Shuttle Challenger exploded (a year later) from a frozen fuel line. If they'd had the right weather forecast at Cape Kennedy, it never would have happened. White Sands is an alternate landing site for the Shuttle, and weather observing is a critical job!

Be that as it may, the accused found me out, and threatened my life and property. My superiors (Captains Greenmeier and Hlavac, U.S.A.) should have had me transferred immediately, as required by the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Instead, they kept me there at White Sands. I suffered greatly for the next six weeks, until my U.S. Congressman (J.J. "Jake" Pickle, D-Austin, TX) managed a transfer. In the interim, I had a car set on fire, a motorcycle totaled (with me on it) and sundry other transgressions. It was a little war going on out there in the desert. . . The only problem is that these hostilities were NOT done by any of the accused. I now know that for a fact.

In the end, all the drug tests on the accused came back positive, I was given the Army's highest peacetime award, the Army Commendation Medal, and was assigned to a new job at a new installation, Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, Texas. I was not a happy soldier, however; because of the harassment I had suffered and the dozens of laws my superiors had ignored as they tried to destroy me. In their minds, I was the wrongdoer; and they did everything in their power to ruin me.

I complained to the proper authorities at Fort Sam Houston, and then it REALLY hit the fan. The harassment became extreme and protracted. It was so bad I was nostalgic for the lightweights at White Sands. At the time I thought the Army was determined to keep word of rampant drug abuse at their premier research facility from leaking out. Yet, they broke every rule in the book to silence me - and more. They were just not covering up the drug abuse, but the retribution by Command Authority on an enlisted whistle blower ~ and more. I fought every step of the way, and kept careful, meticulous records. Chapter Four of my autobiographical novel Behold Leviathan contains verbatim testimony from my Medical Discharge hearing. The official record of my tribunal is a clear, unambiguous confession by the U.S. Army that they didn't run me off because of the drugs; but because of something far, far more sinister.

You just don't do that to a fellow who had been top of his class at the U.S. Naval Academy, and who'd left because he was bored with the academics and disappointed in the level of discipline. The last straw was recently, when my U.S. Congressman told me that only a formal Act of Congress would force the Army to reopen my case, which I have appealed repeatedly over the last fifteen years as a wrongful discharge.

The bottom line is this: there's something secret at White Sands; real, Real, REAL secret. A smart fellow like me with scruples is the worse possible security threat at a place like that. So they beat me senseless, screwed me to the wall; and figured that was the end of it.

They figured wrong.

The Shores of Babylon

*And the Archangel said to me . . .
The beast that you saw was and is not,
and is about to come out of the Abyss...
and those on Earth will wonder.
- Revelation 17:7-8*

The U.S. Air Force closed its Project Blue Book investigation into UFO's, extraterrestrials, and paranormal phenomena in 1967. This website presents the results of my own investigation; originally I called it "Project Orange Book" because it all centers around the University of Texas at Austin, the flagship institution in the NASA community, a leading defense contractor, and now the main Homeland Security grant college . . .

Not so long ago, I was a PhD student at UT Austin, well on my way to a doctorate in Aerospace Engineering. Two years ago, in fact; between semesters, I was looking into archaeological documents about a place called the Osireion at Abydos that I read about in one of those fairly scholarly, but always very well researched books by Graham Hancock about ancient civilizations. I sort of became obsessed about the place, and much of this website is about my subsequent research. It gets into the creature Leviathan in the Book of Job, whom I conjecture was an extraterrestrial held captive at the Osireion, which is a somewhat obscure temple 100 feet underground. A much more famous temple built by Seti I (the king right after Ramesses, the pharaoh of Exodus fame) is on the surface above it.

I have always been fascinated by the Book of Job. Twenty years ago I wrote a study of the Book of Job, unpublished. The novel Behold Leviathan published three years ago has quotes from Job leading into each chapter, and the story itself has three main characters and is modeled roughly on Job and his three wise friends. And of course there's Leviathan, the ultimately evil creature of the sea described at length in the Book of Job. Originally I had intended this to mean my discovery of the "Great Satan" of the American bureaucracy. One of the other main characters is the Archangel Metatron, and I found references a few weeks ago to several mysterious etchings on the stone walls of the Osireion that they call Metatron's Cubes.

The main character is named Kase who returns in meditation to a deep cavern with a sacred "Ark of the Covenant" and stairs up to a great river. This is very much like the Osireion, which was called "The Well of All Souls" by the famous geographer Strabo in the Roman era. Another famous archaeological site a few kilometers from the Osireion was constructed by the first pharaoh, Khasekhemwy called the Temple of Barques and is a half dozen completely outfitted ocean going ships - right out in the middle of the desert, many kilometers from the Nile River. The novel was written long before I knew anything about the Osireion.

In my latest novel, Deo Vindici, I have some past life regressions by the main character - the Archangel Metatron, again - going back to the Osireion, which just as Graham Hancock and many archaeologists believe, is actually 10,000 years old (conventional Egyptologist say it dates from Seti I, about 3,000 years ago). Actually, I show that it's far older than even 10,000 years, and is an engineered structure, part of a massive aqueduct serving a long lost civilization - ie the race that wrote the Book of Job, which even the Jews acknowledge was not a Hebrew text but about a pagan culture much older than theirs. Something happened and the aqueduct was destroyed and the water supply instantly cut off. There is a map in the "read this next" section showing how the aqueduct could have served an ancient oasis nearby that survived into Antiquity.

What got all this Osireion research started was a course I took in the spring of 2002 at the University of Texas at Austin taught by Professor Riggsby about "Ancient Technology." I did a research paper on aqueducts for the class. It was at the end of that semester that I read Graham Hancock's book "Fingerprints of the Gods" that has a chapter on the Osireion. I found all the original archaeological documents dating from the early 1900's when they discovered that place at the UT Library, checked them out and brought them home to study. Only a few days later ALL six books were recalled by the Library, and were never returned to the public shelves at the Perry Castaneda Library. In fact, the whole section on Abydos is no longer there. (I've checked the library several times since, and the books are not there.) Moreover, the "Ancient Technology" class has not been taught again, even though it was extremely popular as an elective for science and engineering majors.

Kind of sounds like "Raiders of the Lost Ark" doesn't it - curious graduate student stumbles on artifacts that Nazi scientists had found at the turn of the century, and had tried to remove from the public eye. The same findings that had led the Nazis along the exact same trail of reasoning I follow in my web site, to conclude that Leviathan was an alien with "special powers." That is, Leviathan was brought in the "dog kennel sized" Ark of the Covenant by the ancient Hebrews to the battle field, and they were never defeated ~ because of the strange temporary psychosis the creature imposes on people. The Nazis wanted this power.

I show on the "Roswell 1984" tab how White Sands Missile Range, only a few miles from Roswell where the alleged UFO crashed in 1947, was staffed to a large extent by ex-Nazi scientists used to build the atom bomb, test it at the nearby Alamogordo; and test the V2 rockets and start our space program after the war. I conjecture that the bomb was set off there to attract the attention of an alien spacecraft; and the V2 rockets being "tested" there were used to shut down the UFO, and the survivors were kept at the High Energy Laser facility there. All neatly done by Nazis under a cloak of extreme security, and since then maintained as a secret even from the Department of Defense by the scientific community.

The University tried to shut me up with this patently absurd letter of dismissal. Their true reason for getting rid of me was that I wrote the novel Behold Leviathan. They are building a new home for the "baby" Leviathan that landed at Roswell in 1947, a multi million dollar facility called a "wet lab" in the basement of the new microbiology building annex. I know about this because an old friend of mine is the construction superintendent there. It will be completed in the very near future, and soon the entire student body at UT Austin will be lobotomized. . . Nobody will be able to say a thing, though, because the University will have all the "Homeland Security" funds they need to shut them up, and permanent like. Moms and Pops, don't send your kids to Texas.

I actually visited that "Star Wars" missile defense laser facility at White Sands, called by the acronym HELSTAF. It was not long after that I experienced some strange psychological symptoms similar to those described in the writings on the Osireion walls; and similar to those experienced by Admiral James Forrestal, right after he visited White Sands. Forrestal was the Secretary of Defense during and after World War II who was responsible in the fall of 1947 (the crash happened at Roswell on July 4 of that year) for starting up an ultra secret organization called the Office of Policy Coordination, the OPC. It was kind of the predecessor to Homeland Security, as it was empowered with wide ranging powers over the entire "military industrial complex."

Admiral Forrestal was hospitalized not long after visiting White Sands to set up the OPC, and jumped or was thrown out of his hospital room at Bethesda Naval Hospital, and died. Until the very end he was convinced that "the zionists" were after him. (Refer to the tab by that name.) Incidentally, the Book of Job has often been called the first psychotherapy session as the three friends endeavoured to help Job recover after an encounter with Leviathan from a condition not unlike mine, and Admiral Forrestal's.
